

Dearest Friend!

I have made all sorts of acquaintances but have not yet found any congenial company. I do not know what there is about me that attracts people; so many like me and become attached to me, and then I am always sorry that we can travel only a short way together. When you ask me what the people here are like, I must answer: Like people everywhere! There is a certain monotony about mankind. Most people toil during the greater part of their lives in order to live, and the slender span of free time that remains worries them so much that they try by every means to get rid of it. O Destiny of man!

They are a very good sort of people, however. Whenever I forget myself and enjoy in their company the pleasures still granted to human beings, can exchange friendly jokes in all frankness and candor around a well-set table, then I know that I must be at the Really, Really big LITT Bash.
